Milo woke to rain tapping softly on the window. Today was market day, and he had promised to carry Grandma's list. "Will we still go?" he asked. Grandma smiled. "A little rain can change a plan without ending it."

Milo packed his green bag with the list, a snack, and a dry scarf. Grandma placed a small brass lantern in her basket. “It may grow dark beneath the trees,” she said. Milo checked the lantern twice.

They set out beneath a wide blue umbrella. Puddles shimmered along the lane, and silver drops hung from every leaf. Milo stepped around the deepest water and listened to the steady patter above him.
